Disorder of multiple personalities

Switch to the dissociative disturbance of the main content identity (DID), previously indicated as a multiple personality disorder, it is a dissociative disorder that involves a disturbance of identity in which two or more states of distinct and separate personalities (or identity) control The behavior of an individual. Sa Different times. When under the control of a single identity, a person is usually able to remember some of the events that occurred, while other personalities were in control. The different identities, of which as it alters, can present differences in language, mannerisms, attitudes, thoughts and gender orientation. Altera can also present physical differences, such as allergies, right or left or left-handed manuals or spectacle needs. These differences between alters are often quite surprising. A person who lives with DID can have from a minimum of two alters or as many as 100. The average number is about 10. Often alter are stable over time, continuing to play specific roles in life the person s for years. Some alters can accommodate aggressive trends, directed to individuals in the person s environment or to others alters within the person. At the moment a person who lives with Did first look for professional help, he or she is usually not aware of their condition. A very common complaint in people suffering from DID is episodes of amnesia, or loss of time. These individuals may be able to remember events in whole or in part of a period of time to proceed. They can repeatedly meet people who do not know that they claim to know them, they find themselves somewhere without knowing how they arrived à ĉ
