Allied races reputation guide

Using the Race Change service to turn a character into an allied race will prevent the obtention of the armor as well. Void elves allowed them to give a unique and distinct "flavor of blood elves" to the Alliance.[14] Since then, Blizzard have added blue-eyed High elf customization options to both Void elves and High elves, and gave more varied skin colors to Void elves including all Blood elf skin color options.[15] They've then also added more varied hair color options to Void elves.[16] Notes and trivia An allied race character can be boosted with the Character Boost service but will not receive their heritage armor set. At BlizzCon 2017, when asked if they could be a future allied race, Ion Hazzikostas said that "blood elves are pretty much high elves, and void elves are pretty much another flavor of high elves". The next closest race, Zandalari, have many unique animations but are still ultimately a modified night elf skeleton. ^ Ornyx 2018-06-12. There are no new allied races planned for the launch of World of Warcraft: Shadowlands.[22] Allied races won't be able to start in Exile's Reach as they already have their own starting areas and begin at level 10.[23] Kul Tiran are the only allied race to use a completely unique animation skeleton. Allied race characters now start at level 10 (was 20). High elves are not planned as an allied race. Due to not being introduced until after Wrath of the Lich King and lacking their own representation in the Argent Tournament, the allied races use their respective core race choice after completing [25-30] The Aspirant's Challenge. These requirements are account-wide, not character-bound, so players can earn each requirement on different characters on different realms and still unlock the allied race.
