By means of CBTC systems, the position of a train is known with greater precision than with traditional systems. In this way it is possible to manage rail traffic more effectively and safely. Meters (and other rail systems) are capable of progress by maintaining or even improving safety, security. The CBTC system is a "continuous and automatic train control system that uses the high-resolution train location, regardless of the track circuits; Train data communications, high capacity, high capacity, and training and road processors capable of implementing the automatic protection of the train. Functions (ATP), as well as optional operation of automatic operation (ATO) and automatic supervision monitoring of Train (ATS), "as defined in the IEEE 1474 standard. [2] Fund and origin The main objective of CBTC is to increase track capacity by reducing the time interval between trains. Traditional signal systems detect trains in discrete sections of the track called "blocks", each protected by signals that prevent a train entering a busy block. Since each block is a fixed section of the track, these systems are called fixed block systems. In a mobile block CBTC system, the protected section for each train is a "block" that moves with the train and the trails behind him, and provides continuous communication of the exact train position through the radio, the inductive loop, etc. [3] Airtrain of SFO Airtrain at the San Francisco Airport was the first CBTC system based on the radio, opened the first CBTC system based on the world's radio (APM) from San Francisco Airport in February of 2003. A few months later, in June 2003, Alstom presented the railway application of its radio technology on the Singapore North East line. Previously, CBTC has its previous origins in the systems based on the radio.
